

Loosening limits is the wrong thing to do. If anything you should be tightening them. If you wish to see the results of loosening the rules just look at commercial radio. You blew that one. Stations that appeal to diverse audiences no longer exist. I no longer listen to radio. I go to the swap meet and buy old CDs so I can hear the music I like. Truthfully, I can still find it streamed on the internet but the way things are going that avenue is not going to last much longer. You need to think of the average citizen, not big business when you make your decision. If you do, the only reasonable decision is to tighten the rules and bring diversity back into the broadcasting business. I really don't care too much about TV, but I sure do wish you would revisit the radio question and right the dreadful mistake you have made.
